To whom this may concern,

Hi, my name is Matthew Ho. I am a maker and designer currently studying at the Rhode Island School of Design, and I'm looking for an internship opportunity for the summer. I believe that I'm the perfect fit for the product design internship position at Facebook.

Outside of academics, I have had a lot of experience working in the design field. I have worked with a variety of companies with both client and internal design work. I have taught design twice. In an international summer program in New Mexico, my workshop was the highest rate of all activities, at 9.4/10. That summer was also the highest revenue that the program had ever generated.

At RISD's elite graphic design program, my work is often easily recognizable. On top of a general excellence in color, typography, form, and other pillars of graphic design, my work often incorporates a recognizable wit. It's the silent cleverness that causes the audience to think, and leaves an impression in their minds. This has become my voice as a designer.

I take great joy in experimenting in the world of graphic design, and bringing something unexpected to class. I will intentionally reinterpret mediums, and break rules. Even if I try something new and fail, I still learn. After all, the world won't stop moving forward. It's up to the innovators and experimenters to tell it which direction it should go.

This is where Facebook comes in. I am looking for an opportunity to absorb as much as I can, and working with your elite team can help me grow to become the best designer that I can be. I would love to contribute my critical analysis, design expertise, but most importantly, my innovative mind. I hope that I can work with Facebook to make something awesome for the world.

Sincerely,
Matthew Ho
